Answer the following in brief but complete responses.

1. Why is the program needed? There is currently no curricular structure for graduate study at USF in humanities and social science perspectives in education. The state’s expanded need for education at all levels creates a demand for graduate studies in this area. There is an interdisciplinary track in education at the doctoral level but none at the masters level.

2. What are the primary goals?
   A. Provide a grounding in the interdisciplinary field of Educational Studies for educational professionals and advanced graduate students with research interests in education.
   B. Provide that grounding for masters students interested in advanced graduate studies, as a pathway to USF doctoral programs.

3. What is unique about this program that makes it worthy of approval and something students will want to participate in? USF has the largest concentration of historians of education in the U.S., and faculty in related fields provide options for students interested in the interdisciplinary study of education.

4. What interdisciplinary opportunities exist for this proposal?
   Include other faculty, programs, or colleges that may have interest in the plan

The Anthropology department has explicitly asked for the College of Education to assist doctoral students in an interdisciplinary program. CAS faculty who have related expertise include Mayberry, Tyson, & Vaquera (Sociology) and Borman, Messing, & Zarger (Anthropology).

5. Would the approval this program support the Strategic Plan and if so, how?

An M.A. in Educational Studies would support Goals I and II in creating a new interdisciplinary program with intercollegiate ties when the focus of much public policy is on education. An M.A. would attract doctoral students in other programs interested in developing research expertise in education, creating a flexible option for interdisciplinary doctoral study.
